Huh, I guess the jungle does listen, Tim said. Mila was already wrapping leaves into cones, the way Tim had done the day before. Now that they were no longer under the thick foliage of the jungle, they got drenched quickly, and it wasn't long before they all pressed against each other, back-to-back, trying to stay warm and collect as much water as they could. The rain tasted metallic and warm, but it was liquid, and they were parched. They stayed where they were while the rain poured down around them, drinking as soon as they managed to collect a full cup of water, even though they were no longer thirsty. Even though Mila didn't think their bodies could actually hold onto the water they were not camels, after all and even though Tim confirmed to her that, short of catching and recycling their sweat and the moisture they lost through breathing, the water would just pass out of them, she still felt compelled to drink. Feast and famine, she thought, as she drank down her third cup. And then she saw him Tomas, standing on the road. She startled, and scrambled to her feet. She didnt know what she would say or do once she reached him. But the long grass hid tough tendrils, and her foot got caught in one, and she fell. By the time she extracted herself, he was gone again. Mila! Tim shouted, as he came up behind her. What the hell do you think youre doing? I saw him, she said. I saw him Tomas. You saw him, too? he said. You mean you also saw him? I saw him, Tim said. I didnt want to believe it. I was afraid he was going to try to kill you, but I couldnt be sure he was real. Mila shook her head. He wont kill me, she said. Books in the Series: 1. The Boy From the Sea 2.
